ABSTRACT

The 21st century has experienced paradigm shift in approach towards defining role of woman in social institutions. The welfare and development of women, and it's parameters has redefined into more wider and politically correct perspectives in which the needs of women, portrayed in more realistic way. As an emerging discipline, social work practice has immense opportunities and enough flexibility to adapt the above-mentioned paradigm shift to its practice realm more effectively. And at the same time, the presence of old value system and pseudo cultural, religious baggage's in the environment of knowledge will definitely make the adaptation more complex. It's high time to redefine feministic social work practice into more women existential oriented and that can be the reply to the dilemma which the women community faces today.
